After nearly four years of negotiations in Havana, the GOC and the FARC released the final version of the peace accords on August 24th, which covers all six points of the peace process: 1) rural reform, 2) political participation, 3) end of conflict, 4) illicit drugs, 5) victims, and 6) implementation and verification. The 300-page document includes details, initiatives, and social programs intended to address root causes of the Colombian conflict, and provide for the effective and sustainable social, economic, and political reincorporation of current members of the FARC guerrilla group.

Reincorporation according to the final document is a comprehensive, sustainable, exceptional, and transitory process. The accords advance the argument that effective reincorporation of the FARC will specifically contribute to peace-building through the following processes: converting guerrillas into political-legal subjects, advancing goals of non-repetition, developing and strengthening productive projects and democratic practices in the territories, and promoting reconciliation and peaceful coexistence. Reincorporation also touches on various aspects of the imminent transition. First, it represents a commitment on the part of the FARC to ending the conflict. Second, it is a vote of confidence on the part of current FARC members both in Colombian civil society and in the GOC, and vice versa. Third, it permits current FARC members to enjoy their individual rights, liberties, and duties as civilian citizens once they lay down their arms. Those who sign the accord and participate in the process will also receive suspended sentences until their cases pass through the Special Jurisdiction for Peace.

The following Spotlight includes three sections – political reincorporation, social and economic reincorporation, and remaining concerns – and focuses on elements within Point 3: End of Conflict that address the political and socioeconomic reintegration of current FARC members into civilian life.

REMAINING CONCERNS

Despite the significant advances achieved in the final set of peace accords, questions on the details of reincorporation remain. First, several core aspects remain unclear. For example, the scope, content, and duration of social programs designed to support social and economic reincorporation are undefined, despite the acknowledgment within the accords that they will need to begin as soon as the FARC members begin to lay down their arms. Second, it is not clear from where the financing of large portions of the reincorporation project will emerge. At one point, the accord notes that the GOC will seek international support for the formation of the new political party; however, other aspects of the proposed initiatives are included without reference to their funding sources. Third, while there is one reference to the fact that the reincorporation process will take into account tailored approaches on gender and women’s rights, no further mechanisms or details are provided. Thus, while we have a reasonably clear roadmap of the major components of the reincorporation process, further details remain to follow.
